sand upturned as ever, her eyes the usual size; the freckies as well were all there; but she had gained two qualities which no mere beauty call take the place of, and these were houng. Younger than ever in her life for even as a child she had been oil for her years and pale and shrinking. Now the healthy blood which happiness had sent coursing through het cheeks had filled them out and turned them pink. There were two unmistable dimples when she laughed. "What do you most desire, O my servant?" she asked.

Rebecca clapped her hands softly and Mrs. Vanderpool smiled.

"Why, yes," she said. "That is a there was truth behind the mock human and the said."

Together they walked around the house and out to the throne in the "Queen's Gardens," as Martin always called them,

"Look!" Rebecca exclaimed, "Look up toward the woods off in the dis-tance across the meadows. We are going up there. I told you about them when we first sat here four ago, how they appear dark and shad-owy from a distance, but how, when one is under them, they are all pools of golden sunlight, and warmth and
